For the health of the occupants, the quality of the timber is of fundamental importance. In the technology-loving years of the past decades, people thought they could get a grip on problems such as mold, fungi, or insects by using chemical aids. Since then, the ones who suffered, have been the environment and overall, the health of the inhabitants of the house, who have been exposed to the attacks of chemicals. The fact that such problems can also be solved in a natural way is shown not only by centuries of experience of our ancestors, but also new scientific findings.

In addition to the place of growth or the altitude, as well as a very careful drying the timing of the timber harvest is essential. But even wood harvested at the right time must be properly processed with perfect craftsmanship. Furthermore, the wood needs constructive wood protection. Together with all other quality assurance measures, the desired result is achieved: "life-friendly" wood for health and security for all the house inhabitants.
